LISZT AND CHOPIN PLAYED BY POWELL

Pianist Leaves Beaten Track and Reviews Unfamiliar "Concerto Pathetique."

John Powell gave another plano re-cital yesterday afternoon in Acolian should be. Neither James Huneker nor Edgar Stillman Kelley, both Chopin propagandists, could work up warm en thuslasm over it. The former shudders at its difficulties and the latter relishes its harmonic prophecies of Wagner. They found larger things in smaller works. Mr. Powell in his own programme notes invited consideration of its depth and the tenderness of its emotion. He labored hard to put them on exhibition.

But it was manifest that he was more warmly interested in Liszt's "Concerto Pathetique." The composition has not been publicly performed in years—according to Mr. Powell only once in the last fifteen. Whose was the version used yesterday was left to conjecture. It was probably Mr. Powell's own. Liszt's was not wholly effective either in the solo shape or the arrangement for two planos. Burmeister made a concerto with orchestra out of it, but that was not altogether convincing, either. The not altogether convincing either. The version heard yesterday was well made and gave the composition an effective and gave the companies and an ending.

The pianist also informed his audience that the "Don Juan" fantasy was not a mere virtuoso piece, but "a dramatic tone poem of extraordinarily perfect form and of powerful unity." Mr. Powell in the property and optimistic, and in is young, ardent and optimistic, and in riper years will probably be calmer in the presence of the embroidery of "La ci darem" and the excitements of the gay Don's bacchanalian ditty.

Meanwhile music lovers can enjoy this young man's admirable interpretative art. It has virility, imagination and immense technical brilliancy and power. All were displayed yesterday in the Liszt concerto, of which the planist made a veritable tour de force and which he made as interesting as it could be made as interesting as it could be. In time Mr. Powell will without doubt abandon the futile attempt to emphasize every measure in a phrase. make clear his message to his auditor, he sometimes breaks the melodic line of his music. But despite mistakes Mr. Powell's piano playing is worthy of admiration, and his strong, sincere personality is breathed through all the music he performs.

THE RUSSIAN CHOIR.

Cathedral Singers.

Russian Cathedral choir gave a concert of Russian church music t Acolian Hall last evening. The pre gramme contained six numbers b Tschaikowsky and six by Rachmaninos The purpose of the choirmaster, Mr. Gorokhov, was to show the character-istics of the styles of the two masters in their ecclesiastic composition of which were sung in settings by both musicians. The singing of the choir was much better than at its concerts of last winter, when it was wanting greatly in accuracy of intonation and general technical finish. Last evening the intonation showed decided improvement, though it was not perfect. Some of tonation showed decided improvement, though it was not perfect. Some of the attacks and some of the muances were most admirable. Mr. Gorokhov is hampered by the quality of the voices at his disposal, but probably they are the best to be had here.

Of the highly specialized character of Russian church music something has been said in this place after previous concerts of this choir. In the compositions of recent masters there is less of the Oriental strain than is to be heard in the earlier chants, or even in the cital yesterday afternoon in Acolian thall, and according to his now professed purpose played things not common to the marketplace, 'His programme consisted of Chopin's allegro de concert, nocturne in B major, barcarole and tarantella, Lisat's "Concerto Pathetique" and his "Don Juan" fantasia.

The three shorter Caopin numbers are heard often, but the allegro is not. Nor is there any pressing reason why it should be. Neither James Huneker nor
